

A thesis submitted for the degree of Masters of Arts with Honours of the University of New England

Intersections between science and belief in some
'novels of ideas' by Aldous Huxley and C.S. Lewis

Robert Arthur Franklin

October 2006

CONTENTS

	Acknowledgements	Page	III
Chapter 1	THE ORIGINS AND INTENTIONS OF THIS THESIS		1
Chapter 2	ALDOUS HUXLEY (1894-1963)
	PART ONE: BIOGRAPHICAL INTRODUCTION		8
	PART TWO: ON SCIENCE AND SCIENTISTS		22
	PART THREE: ON BELIEF AND MYSTICISM		66
Chapter 3	C.S. LEWIS (1898-1963)
	PART ONE: BIOGRAPHICAL INTRODUCTION		125
	PART TWO: ON SCIENCE AND SCIENTISTS		138
	PART THREE: ON BELIEF AND THEOLOGY		178
Chapter 4	SOME CONCLUSIONS		229
	Epilogue		252
	Bibliography		253

Acknowledgements.

For a start, I must express my gratitude to the University of New England, particularly the School of English, Communication and Theatre for giving me the opportunity to undertake a project which I have thoroughly enjoyed and which may prove of some benefit to others.

Next, I thank my Supervisors, Associate Professor John Sprott Ryan and Dr. Elizabeth Hale, for their patience, scholarly advice, and their proof-reading of the evolving text. Similar thanks also are accorded to Associate Professor Ron Bedford, who stepped in when needed as a temporary Supervisor, and who previously guided me through the B.A (Honours) Award. Nor can the encouragement and assistance given me – especially at those times when morale was waning – by both the School's Associate Professor Michael Sharkey, as well as an independent mentor, Dr. Iqbal Khan, pass without a mention.

A University cannot function without competent non-academic staff, and the Dixon folk have always proved swift to act and reliable in their service. In a like fashion, librarians at Southern Cross University and at various regional libraries in the Northern N.S.W. area have been helpful when called upon.

Lastly, but certainly by no means least, to Lynda Eather, who has performed the masterly task of transforming a mass of scribbles and scrawls into a tidy and readable document, and who has on each occasion of our meeting acted in a cordial, generous and positive way, your invaluable support has been appreciated during the last twelve months.