

Table of Instruments in Trecento Documents

Many modern studies are rich in documentation relating to musical performance. Publications by Zippel, Cellesi, D'Accone, Brown, Polk, Wilson and McGee¹, mostly written to document the rich musical life of late medieval Florence, have published documents identifying the names of instruments used at that time. The following table is derived from these and directly from late medieval writers to identify the original archival or literary sources of our knowledge of the trecento instrumentarium and to contextualize the instruments by citing, where possible, a line of text from the original source.

In documenting the use of trecento musical instruments, five categories of documents have been searched: payment records from surviving archives², contemporary chronicles³, contemporary literature⁴, medieval music theory treatises⁵ and relevant modern accounts⁶. This catalogue excludes musical activities that do not necessarily involve instruments, such as singing and dancing: these will be displayed in another table. Frequently encountered generic names for musicians such as suonatore and piffaro have not been included in the catalogue of instruments as the instruments actually played are not specified: the Suonatori della Signoria comprised trombadori (players of trombe), trombetti (trumpet players) and pifferi, who played shawms and bombardas. These generic musicians are listed separately.

Documents with the document number beginning with [D] are usually payment records and, therefore, refer only to musicians who were paid for their work, irrespective of whether this was a full-time occupation or just an occasional engagement. Document numbers beginning with [L] are taken from contemporary literature, Dante, Boccaccio, Sacchetti, Jacopo da Voragine, Folgore da San Gimignano, Petrarca, Brunetto Latini and Prudenzani. While the works from which these documents have been extracted make no pretence at giving a factual account of Florentine musical practice, they are important for describing the musical activities of those not usually paid for their musical activity – the amateur players who were an important part of the Florentine soundscape. More descriptive of actual events are the documents whose document number begins with [C]: contemporary chronicles describing festive occasions, especially those by Goro Dati and Giovanni Sercambi, Giovanni Villani and Filippo Villani. extensively gathered in the *Thesaurus Musicarum Latinarum*⁷, sometimes discuss the use of musical instruments but do not necessarily reflect trecento musical practice: the systrum, for example, an instrument known from Egyptian times, and symphonia are nowhere documented in other trecento documents. Two exceptions are the treatises by the Dominican Jerome of Moravia and the Franciscan Juan Gil da Zamora, which may have been used in the education of young friars⁸ and Johannes de Grocheio's De Musica, which describes musical life in Paris, where many Florentine friars were educated.⁹

The search was based on the linguistic root of the instrument name, e.g. viol or viuol for fiddle. This produced successful hits for viola and viuola but also irrelevant words like violenza (violence); the root organ produced verbs like organizzare (to organize). This led to the establishment of a list of words to be excluded.

From the initial file of 78,127 documents, a file of 857 unique records was developed with one keyword for each line¹⁰ of the document in which the keyword is found. This file includes names of instruments, generic terms used for instruments such as istormenti and stormenti, but generic terms for players of instruments such as suonatori and pifferi as well as more specific terms such as cennamellarius (shawm player) and trombadori (trumpeters) were labelled as musicians and saved for a separate table. It also identifies non-instrumental musical activities such as singing (both monophonic – cantare and polyphonic – biscantare) and dancing – danzare and its cognate forms. These are also listed in a separate table.

¹² ASF: PR No. 73, for 1384, records an isolated payment to "Chellinus Benini de flor, sonator viole" (fol. 4r). There is no statement about his duties, nor does his name appear again on the pay list. It is interesting to note that the lute and viola were the instruments usually played by cantastorie, including the civic herald. It is doubtful that extra instrumentalists would be needed for this duty. It is possible, however, that their purpose was to play instrumental music and accompany singing other than that performed all'improvviso. (McGee note 42)
