Declaration of authorship

I, Albrecht Gerber, hereby declare that this dissertation is an original piece of research and firmly based on primary source material. It has never before been submitted either in part or whole to this or any other University for the purpose of a higher degree. All sources, both primary and secondary, are appropriately acknowledged, and to the best of my knowledge accurate. Except where otherwise stated, all conclusions are my own.

Abstract

Gustav Adolf Deissmann was a German theologian who gained international repute during his lifetime for his pioneering contributions in the widely divergent fields of postclassical Greek philology, lexicography, the archaeological excavations of Ephesus, international conciliation and the ecumenical movement. He was the recipient of many national and international distinctions, including eight honorary doctorates from six different countries, and was twice nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize. Yet until recent years this internationally influential academic has been almost completely overlooked by modern scholarship, and although an upsurge of interest in Deissmann has occurred during the past decade – driven primarily by research from German theological Faculties – this has tended to stereotype him far too narrowly as an ecumenist.

Until now, the lack of a broadly contextualised and balanced evaluation of Deissmann's life and work has had the effect of limiting or even distorting our views of some important aspects in the history of classical scholarship, the history of Germany's 20th century socio-religious development, the history of the archaeological excavation of Ephesus and in the history of the international ecumenical movement. However, this dissertation seeks to redress these deficiencies, by developing the central thesis that Deissmann has played a pivotal role in several wholly different fields of scholastic inquiry and that it is, therefore, high time that both the man himself and his extraordinary contributions be properly recognised.

The dissertation itself is constructed in three parts:

Part One demonstrates how Deissmann's innovative philological approach to the language of the NT has led to a rethinking among researchers of postclassical Greek, and shows that despite the loss of his almost completed NT lexicon, Deissmann's lexicographical contributions remain fundamental for the understanding of koine Greek.

Part Two makes the point that Deissmann's extraordinary interest in the archaeology of Ephesus is directly traceable to his philological study tour of the Middle East in 1906, and argues that were it not for his high international profile and energetic intervention for the salvaging of the ancient city's archaeological remains, inestimable and irreversible historical losses would have been inevitable.

Part Three shows that even though Deissmann was one of the foremost supporters of Friedrich Naumann's social reforms, by 1933 he had become sceptical of German politics. This part further demonstrates that his Evangelischer Wochenbrief (with its English translation, Protestant Weekly Letter) was not written as war propaganda, but rather as an innovative forum for Völkerverständigung. It argues that, his subsequent leading role in the ecumenical movement notwithstanding, Deissmann was not a 'true' ecumenist, and establishes that his slide into obscurity was a combination of his own characteristics and external circumstances.

Part Four (not formally an element of 'the thesis') comprises a series of appendices transcripts or excerpts of documents which substantiate many of the statements made in the thesis itself.

Preface

This thesis is submitted in the field of Greek; but it may broadly be considered as a Forschungsgeschichte topic, since by its nature it embraces aspects of 20th century German social, political and church history, and also certain features of New Testament studies, the ecumenical movement and of archaeological work in Turkey. I have made a conscious decision, therefore, to explain some features in each of these areas which may be deemed ‘elementary’ by specialists in these spheres, so that readers with a different disciplinary background have sufficient context for those aspects which may be less familiar to them.

Some material within this thesis draws on the following publications written by me:

- ‘Gustav Adolf Deissmann (1866-1937): trailblazer in biblical studies, in the archaeology of Ephesus, and in international reconciliation’, Buried History, Journal of the Australian Institute of Archaeology, 41, 2005, 29-42.
- ‘Gustav Adolf Deißmann, die Heidelberger Papyri und ein Durchbruch in griechischer Philologie’, Proceedings of the 24th International Congress of Papyrology, Helsinki, 1-7 August, 2004, 1, J. Frösén/ T. Purola/ E. Salmenkivi, eds., Helsinki, 2007, 369-83.
- ‘Gustav Adolf Deissmann (1866-1937) and the revival of archaeological excavations at Ephesus after the First World War’, ÖJh., 75, 2006 [2007], 39-46.

Since this dissertation makes use of a wide range of German primary sources – some dating back to before the orthographical reforms of 1901, or even before 1880, when Konrad Duden (1829-1911) published his momentous German dictionary – irregular and occasionally idiosyncratic spelling and punctuation occurs in a number of citations. However, the convention adopted in this dissertation is to quote excerpts as accurately as possible in their original form (i.e. uncorrected). It is, therefore, not unusual to encounter certain words spelt variously, sometimes even within the same document or citation, particularly in respect to compounds. the ‘eszett’ (‘ß’) as opposed to the double sibilant ‘ss’, or the older ‘th’ as opposed to the newer ‘t’. Deissmann regularly signed his name with an ‘eszett’ (i.e. Deißmann), but in typed correspondence normally used the alternative ‘ss’; and, except for citations, this latter spelling is the one preferred in this work. On occasions where a word is either illegible, or missing because of document damage, this is normally signalled thus: ‘[?. illegible]’.

Italics are used in the text to indicate published works, foreign words and – very occasionally – for emphasis, but within the footnotes are reserved only for published works.

I am grateful to the host of individuals and institutions who have provided me with kind assistance and encouragement in the research of this dissertation; they are acknowledged wherever appropriate in this thesis. I owe, however, a very special debt of gratitude to Dr. phil. Gerhard Deissmann and to his niece, Angelika Deissmann, for making me feel warmly welcome in their Bremen home on three extended occasions, and for giving me much background information, as well as unfettered access to their private family papers and other material. My research in Germany during 2002 and 2004 has been considerably facilitated by two generous grants from the University of New England through the Keith & Dorothy Mackay Postgraduate Travelling Scholarship (2002) and the Maiben Davies Postgraduate Scholarship in Classics (2004), for both of which I am much obliged. I also want to thank my two supervisors, Professor G.H.R. Horsley (UNE Armidale) and Professor John Moses (Canberra) for their wise and patient counsel, and Dr Manfred Kandler (Vienna), Dr Hartmut Ludwig (Berlin) and Dr Annette Gerlach and her staff at the Zentral- und Landesbibliothek in Berlin, for their frequent and much valued help. Finally, I pay tribute to my dear wife, Marianne, for without her unwavering support I could not have completed this work.
