ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

My greatest debt is to two scholars who have contributed so much towards the development of this thesis: Dr Greg Stanton and the late Dr Charles Tesoriero. Whatever is good in this thesis is due to their example and assistance. Special mention must be made of Dr Greg Stanton who, as my supervisor, had the vigilance to continually question my assumptions and direct me towards the final product. At a critical stage in its development this thesis was read with benevolence by him and he has significantly improved the final results of this study. Dr Charles Tesoriero should also be thanked for his initial guidance towards a research area that has proven both challenging and rewarding. I am grateful not only to them, but to all the friends and colleagues who contributed to my enjoyable and fruitful years at the University of New England. Thanks must also go to my family and friends for their support and understanding. Another contributor in assisting its development has been my wife, Olivia, who with my son, Callan, has shown the greatest patience for me to embark on such a challenging topic. I dedicate the following pages to them both with my utmost love and affection.
