ABSTRACT

This thesis explores and explains the roles that communalism, Muslim nationalism and Sindhi ethnic identity performed in the Sind during the period 1920-1951. In particular, the argument is presented that in the case of Sind, a regional, ethnic identity was as significant a factor as the 'Islamic response' in mobilising the support of the Muslim provincial elites for the Pakistan demand. It will be explained how the changes which colonial rule brought to Sind's economic and political infrastructure prompted the response from the Muslim elites of demanding the separation of the province from the Bombay Presidency in the first decades of the twentieth-century. The granting of the Sindhi Muslims' separatist demands by the British in 1932 represented the legitimisation of their entwining communal and ethnocentric issues, and resulted in furthering the development of a distinctive Sindhi Muslim political identity. The subsequent structuring of state institutions under the provisions of provincial autonomy served to politicise religious identity. Combined with the legacy of the Sind Separation movement, state structures encouraged the communalisation of provincial politics. Although the establishment of the provincial government in 1937 offered Sindhi Muslims the opportunity to govern the province, they were consistently outmanoeuvred by Hindu members in the Assembly. Failed attempts by the land-owning Muslim leaders to use an Islamic discourse to control political action in the public arena, and the strengthening of Hindu political power, demonstrated the need for assistance from the All-India Muslim League. By 1943, the establishment of a strong Muslim League provincial government formed a watershed in Sindhi politics. The catalyst for the popularity of the Pakistan movement came with the definition that it was to mean the creation of the sovereign state of Sind. Ethnicity as well as religious identity shaped the Pakistan movement in Sind as it became the vehicle for the Sindhi Muslims to achieve their goals which the Sind Separation movement and provincial autonomy had failed to deliver. The centralising of Muslim politics into Jinnah's hands produced the culmination of communalism in the creation of an highly centralised Pakistan Government. The seizure of Karachi by the Pakistan Government, the resettlement of Muslim migrants in Sind's cities (thus replacing Sind's Hindus with non-Sindhi Muslims), the dismissal of the Sindhi Government and the replacement with central rule (1951), produced a legacy which Pakistan increasingly bears today.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The origin of this thesis lies in a brief journey I made to the Indian sub-continent, including the province of Sind, in 1982. The journey stimulated a great interest in the histories of India and Pakistan, and I undertook university studies in order to answer the numerous questions which the sub-continent had provoked. Of course, more questions than answers were revealed, and some of the more provoking questions concerned the modern political history of Sind. In the course of an honours programme which focused on the roles of the Muslim-majority provinces' in the Pakistan movement, the surprising absence of material dealing with the province produced a considerable void in the literature. That sense of surprise turned to concern, because it became obvious that without an adequate explanation of Sindhi politics for the first half of the twentieth-century, the existing interpretations of the Pakistan movement had been made without all of the pieces of the puzzle being revealed.

The research into Sind's history during this course of study has been thoroughly rewarding. I acknowledge the privileges of embarking on an area which does not carry the footfalls of the more familiar areas of colonial India's history. However, seven years' exploration of uncharted territories has not been without its trials, and I owe an immense debt to the patience and generosity of my supervisors: Associate Professor Howard Brasted of the University of New England, and Dr. Jim Masselos of Sydney University. To Associate Professor Brasted, I express my gratitude for so unhesitatingly sharing his considerable wisdom of Jinnah and Muslim politics, and for setting such a high standard of scholarship. Most of all, I thank him for his friendship. To Jim, I sincerely thank for consistently making his time available, his feedback and for his probing questions which led to new and fruitful perspectives. Without their encouragement and commitment to the value of the project this thesis could not have been written.

I would also like to acknowledge the assistance by words of personal advice so kindly given in all too brief moments with Ian Copland, Robin Jeffrey, Peter Reeves, John Maguire, David Gilmartin, Mushirul Hasan, Sandria Freitag, Sarah Ansari, D.A Low, Romila Thapar, and particularly Sinnappah Arasaratnam. As a student undertaking the doctorate programme externally, and part-time, their comments have been of immense personal importance. The activities of the National Centre for South Asian Studies have been especially useful in bringing students and distinguished scholars together.

There are several other people to whom I acknowledge my gratitude. The warmth of the Brasted family, the encouragement of Noel Keleher, and the enthusiasm of John Bloomfield have helped make my period of research and writing a personally rewarding one. I wish to thank the generosity of my employer, the Australian Taxation Office, with especial thanks Terry de Ste.Croix for his support. I would also like to thank the staff at the Dixson Library and the Oriental and India Office Library in London, whose cooperation and endeavours contributed in no small way to my being able to complete the doctorate.

Most of all, I must thank Julie. Her patience and faith will never be forgotten.
